

What is a chain and how can it affect me?

What is a chain?

A chain is a sequence of linked house purchases, each of which is dependent on the preceding and succeeding purchase.

Each member of the chain is a house sale, which depends both upon the buyers receiving the money from selling their houses and on the sellers successfully buying the houses that they intend to move into.

For example, in a four-household chain, A buys B's house, B uses the money from that sale to buy C's house, and C uses the money from that sale to buy D's house. (A chain can be circular. This example becomes circular if D buys A's house.) All sales in a chain complete and finalise on the same day. On that day, all the households involved in the chain leave their former homes and move to their new homes.

How can it affect me?

This situation is notorious for being liable to "break" if one of the transactions fails, for example due to financial difficulties, a change of heart, or the practice of gazumping. The failure of one member of the chain fouls the whole set of transactions. The remaining chain fragments must find new buyers and sellers to form new chains.

A chain begins with a household buying a house without selling their current house. Examples:

- A household that does not currently own a house. This may be a first time buyer, such as a household moving out of rented accommodation. It may also be the result of a household splitting, for example a grown child leaving home.
- A household retaining ownership of their old house after moving out. For example, they may wish to rent it out, or merely leave it vacant and keep it on the market.

A chain ends with a house being sold and not depending on existing owners buying a house to move into. Examples:

- A household moving into a vacant house. It may be a newly-built house or a house rendered vacant due to the death of its occupant or occupants or the departure of former tenants.
- A household moving to join an existing household.
- A household moving to temporary accommodation until they can buy a new house.
- A household moving into rented accommodation or a nursing home

Here at Williams Hedge we will identify the length of your chain and advise you of any potential "weak links". This will allow you to make informed decisions. We will also monitor your chain and ensure it is running smoothly. Good communication between parties is the key to a successful move.
